Why is Pender Different? A History of Identifying Catalysts

We are focused on ensuring we preserve and grow the capital investors have entrusted to us and an acquisition is both a liquidity event and a potential value creation event. So how do we pinpoint a take-out candidate? "The truth is we rarely buy expecting a take-out...it's a by-product of our process, our private equity approach to public markets."¹ More than stock picking, we fundamentally analyse every aspect of a potential holding, which includes the customer base, the competition and the industry as a whole. It also helps that we have held board positions, "You're in the boardroom when management is deciding whether to acquire another company, so you really understand the motivation behind buying a company, which gives you an ability to assess what types of companies other people want to buy."¹
